7 Hospitals

7.1 Hospitals in the Czech Republic

A general hospital is usually devided into two parts, an outpatient department and an inpatient department. The outpatient department has a number of surgeries and consulting rooms, waiting rooms, a filing cabinet where records are kept, laboratories and X-ray units (unless such services are provided by the inpatient department).

The basic component unit of the inpatient department is called the ward where patients are admitted for treatment. A ward unit consists of rooms for patients, a treatment room, sister's room, bathroom and lavatories; there may also be an admission room, a kitchenette, a small laboratory. In charge of each ward is the ward sister, who is responsible to the head nurse and to the medical staff, and is assisted by the rest of the nursing staff (staff nurses, probationer nurses, auxiliary nurses).

A large hospital consists of inpatient departments of medicine, surgery, pediatrics, obstetrics and gynaecology; specialized departments covering infectious diseases, diseases of the chest, neurology, psychiatry, ophtalmology, and orthopaedic surgery. Outpatient services include all these as well as departments for tuberculosis and respiratory diseases, dermatology, dentistry, adolescent medicine, urology, oncology and sports medicine. Auxiliary services are provided by the departments of anaesthesiology, an X-ray department, a blood transfusion centre, a rehabilitation centre, and specialized laboratories, e.g. a pathology laboratory. There are also departments of stomatology, forensic medicine, paediatric surgery, occupational diseases, a tissue bank, a flying squad, etc.

The patients are seen daily by the medical staff, led by the head physician, usually during the morning ward round. Operations are performed in the operating theatre.
